actually get there, don't forget to look into a new veterinarian for your dog. You never know when you might need an emergency visit to the vet, and having one in mind makes the situation a little easier to control. You also want your dog to feel comfortable with the new veterinarian quickly, so get the process started by making an appointment soon after your move. It's nice to begin the relationship with a meet-and-greet so your dog can get familiar with the new face early on. Get Your Dog Microchipped You and your dog might both be unfamiliar with the new area, which is why it's wise to have your dog microchipped. If your dog wanders off and gets lost, a microchip can help you get back to each other. If someone finds your dog and brings him or her to a shelter or veterinarian, the animal professional can then look up your contact information by scanning the microchip. Just like humans, animals can feel anxious or overwhelmed when moving from one home to another. By giving your dog enough attention, rounding out the pet care team, and making sure both of you are prepared for the move, you can keep Fido comfortable through the transition.

Moving is stressful enough for humans—imagine what it's like for pets. It's up to us to help our pets get through the move without too much anxiety, and a few simple steps can make a big difference. Read ahead and learn how to help your dog through a move. Put Together an Essentials Bag When you move to a new house, you might put together an "essentials bag", or a collection of things that you keep on your person during the trip. Just like you'd bring an essentials bag for your children or for your kids, bring one for your dog. Your dog's essentials bag could include a favorite toy, snacks for positive reinforcement on the road, or comforting items like soft blankets. Anything that could make your dog more comfortable during the transition should stay on-hand. Offer Plenty of TLC Moving can be a big change for a pet, so it might take your dog a little while to adjust. During this time, it's extra important to show affection and care. Rub your dog's head or belly often, give him or her plenty of attention, and take regular walks around the neighborhood—you might even visit a local dog park. It's okay to give your dog more treats than you normally would until any anxiety subsides. Try to Stay Home Once you land at your new place, consistency will be more important to your pup than ever. With so much change going on, your dog might need a little extra reassurance that things will soon feel normal again. If you have some control over your schedule, try to stay at home as much as you can over the first week or two. Spend some time with your dog in this new setting and make it clear that you'll still be around. Creating associations between you and the new place will help your dog settle in. Find a New Vet Before Moving When you research the area where you're moving before you
